"We present a simple partial equilibrium model of a monopolistically competitive firm hiring labor on a competitive market and facing several public policy instruments. Corporate and value added taxes along with payroll expenses drive a firm towards informal economy, while government's efforts in identifying these deviations together with punitive lump sum fines pull them back. We show that under circumstances in which firm optimally underreports its sales and wages paid the binding minimum wage rate instruments not only less wage underreporting but necessarily also higher reported sales."
